Example speech 2 - Dango

Introduction:

Hi, I'm _____, and I'll talk about dango. If you don't know, dango are traditional Japanese sweets. First I'll tell you how dango are made. Then I'll talk about three popular varieties. Finally, I will tell you where you can enjoy dango.

Main point 1:

Dango are made from rice flour and water. You mix the flour and water and knead them. Then you divide the mix into balls and boil them. Three to five dango are skewered on a bamboo stick. This means you can eat them by hand and without mess, making them a convenient snack. Other kinds of dango can be made by mixing in sugar or flavourings like matcha.

Main point 2:

There are many different kinds of dango, but here are some popular ones. Anko dango: These are covered with sweet red bean paste. They are sweet, and delicious with green-tea. Chadango: These are green-tea flavoured and sometimes also have sweet red bean paste on them. Yum. Mitarashi dango: These are very sticky because they are covered in syrup made from soy sauce, sugar and starch.

Main point 3:

So where can you get dango? Well, most supermarkets and convenience stores sell them, but you can find the most delicious dango in specialty dango shops. Sadly, most of these stores don't make enough money and have to close, so if you want to eat dango, please go to these shops to support dango makers so they can keep making wonderful dango.

Conclusion:

To summarise, dango are easy to make and eat, have many different flavours, and are even a way of life for some people. For these reasons, you should visit my family's dango store and buy lots of dango. Thank you for listening.
